Mr. Ellis, the philologist, took the chair. This invention consists of thirty signs, by means of which, and their combinations, he is able to represent every sound of which the human vuice is espable. This statement, incredible as it may seem, was proved true after some severe test applied by the commany present. test applied by the consupany present. The test was this: All of the gentlemen present was invited to repeat sentences in any language whatever to Mr. Bell. There were sentences repeated from Ara-bic, Lyriac, Chinese, Sansorit, Hottentot, otc. These Mr. Bell wrote down, though many of the sounds were such as he could not have heard before. Then his son, who had been sent out of the room was recalled, and taking the paper from his father read off every sentence that had been uttered off every sentence that had been intered without—in the opinion of the eminent scholars who gave them fisling in a single accent. Mr. Bell witholds his alphabet from the public, as he wishes it to be brought before the world by a learned before the world by a learned body. It is difficult to estimate the importance of this discovery. It would at mee he felt in a telegraphy, and it may become the basis for a universal language
